THREE PHILOSOPHIES OF WORK

"What are you doing?"

"I'm digging a hole."	"I'm a dirt consultant."	"I'm building a bridge."
It's just something I do over and over. It pays the bills. I can keep doing it as long as we need holes dug by hand. It's honest work.	I dig holes and examine the soil for trends. It is a skill that can lead to better opportunities. My goal is to become chief dirt consultant and top in my field.	It's something I always dreamed of doing. There is nothing else I would do. The bridge will improve our lives and join two communities. This is who I am.

What's your philosophy and approach to your work?

One is not necessarily "better" than the others, but it is worthwhile thinking about what you value in your career and how you prioritize it with all of life's other endeavors.

People go through different life and career stages. Life experiences, personal values, family and social influences all help form our outlook on work.

What are the most important influences and factors that go into your philosophy of work?
